Concept Note:

The process of aspiring and working towards a society that ensures gender equality has been a continuous process throughout history in various degrees. In the past one hundred years, the progressive discourse of gender equality has inspired academic and social work across the world. When one looks back from the vantage point of the early decades of the twenty-first century, one finds movements and waves in gender relations not only in the academia- in the works of Simone de Beauvoir, Julia Kristeva, Elaine Showalter, Judith Butler etc.- but also in the changes in the perception of gender roles in the wider society. The government policies have emboldened the women's emancipation movements by promoting girl-child health, safety and education, economic support through scholarship and awareness drives through media and institutions.

One cannot deny the evolution of awareness that has occurred in our society due to the movements in academic and social discourses in the 20th century. In the present times we find a larger number of women accessing opportunities of education, employment and financial autonomy. At the same time, one finds gaps in awareness and sensitivity in certain demographics determined by caste, class, region and age. The chasm between the discursive high-tower of the academia and the everyday lives of women is bridged by women who are in positions of leadership. Such leadership can be academic, social, economic, political or pertaining to the environment. This seminar invites papers that present, explain and analyse such roles that are played or can be played by women in different fields. The following are the themes on which papers can be presented.

Sub Themes:

1. Women Empowerment: From the mainstream to the subaltern.
2. Financial Independence and Working Women
3. Working Women: Seeking balance between office and home.
4. Policies For Women Empowerment.
5. Working Women: Challenges Ahead.
6. Blind Spots/Limited reach in Women Empowerment.
7. Contemporary Gender Stereotype.
